MORALITY by LLEWELYN POWYS

WHEN we worry about morality, that fanciful topic so closely associated with man's assumed freedom of will, the first thing to be understood is the fact that this tiresome word in its original Latin use denoted nothing more momentous than manners. It was the serpent's wisdom of the priests which first entangled what is our present conception of the word with religious feeling. Religion and ethics in their ultimate origin have little to do with each other. The former is concerned with man's emotional reaction before the miracle of existence, with the wonder that his lonely spirit feels when in a state of heightened awareness it meditates upon the hidden reality behind experience. The other is a mere maiter of conduct, the commonplace adjustment of the individual to the arduous restrictions imposed upon him by the exactions of the social contract.

True religion is identical in all races. In its simplest form it is best expressed by the word awe, awe felt before the pageant of eternal matter, awe felt before the profound mystery of life. Morality is a chameleon-like property that takes a fresh color for its skin in every climate and in every age. It consists of submission to expedient rulings devised by each commonwealth for the advantage of its constitution. Its precepts are for the most part framed to curb the actions of forward persons judged to be detrimental to the public good. It has no divine and no metaphysical sanction. Moral codes occasionally coincide in human colonies far removed from each other. This happens because they represent an accumulation of man's work-aday experience in social agreement and for this reason they have a certain claim upon our attention and deserve to be closely examined before rejection.

It should be remembered, however, when we are disposed to indulge this mood of submissive tolerance, that throughout the generations the legitimate freedom of the individual has been continually subjected to the most arbitrary curtailments for reasons that are often enough sordid and ignoble; for the preservation of private property, for instance, or for the security of certain favored classes.

Those pure moral qualities that especially grace our kind-tenderness, generosity, altruismhad their modest origins in mother love and sexual love. Their beginnings still may be observed at work in the self-effacement of a mother animal. in the courage of a female leopard defending her young, in the fidelity of light-hearted, free-flying birds for their nestlings. In Africa when a herd of impalla are disturbed, the stag will always take up his position at the rear of the stampede, in the place, that is to say, of the greatest danger.

Man's faculty of ethical arbitration is similar to the sensitive mainspring of a clock, and it is about the bland face of this intricate timepiece of human behavior that the hour-hand of civil altruism and the flickering minute-hand of self-realization revolve, the sound working of the machine being dependent upon certain minute proportionate abatements. In human conduct there is no golden rule to follow, always it has been and always it will be a matter for compromise. An infallible decalogue does not exist. The accredited tenets of of freedom. Make no doubt of it, this blest swerve of the atoms defrauds fate of an absolute sway. Like the cows on Portland we are each of us tethered to our destined post, but within the length of our rope we are free to move where we will. We need not harass ourselves overmuch with the "authoritative impostures" of conventional society. Each of us in accordance with his nature must make a settlement in his own personal life between the claims of self-interest and the claims of service to others, using as his guide far-sighted, foxy calculations as to the probable balance of happiness likely to arise from any particular undertaking.

It is most certain that ultimately nothing matters. There is no pity in the clouds. There exist upon earth, however, sensitive values and gross values and it becomes well-bred spirits to advance the cause of the former as far as is compatible with personal happiness.

THE DECLINE OF LIGHT VERSE By NEIL TRIMBLE

DURING the six year life span of the old Masses, from 1911 to 1917, two literary accouchements took place. The first was Poetry founded by Harriet Monroe in 1912; the second was Margaret Anderson's Little Review. Both of these magazines championed causes which rapidly became cults, and one of these cults still exists, although the cause has been forgotten. As soon as the other little magazines noticed the trend they immediately perked up with swollen-necked Communism, radical art and vers libre, and became 100 per cent serious in tone. Then something commenced to fade from our literary horizon, and i is still fading. Free verse did not quite drive out serious rhymed verse, but it did, for a time, provide an effective stop-gap for light verse. The ghosts of Lewis Carroll and W. S. Gilbert were laid quietly away. Lazy experimentalists, whose only previous encouragement had come from the ephemeral Bohemian magazines whose repercussions were severely local, suddenly remembered Stephen Crane's "Black Riders" and the magic name of Whitman, and pounced like vultures on the new magazines of expression. The story of the rapid growth of the movement and of its culmination in the successive coronations of T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound and e. e. cummings is as familiar as the history of the Republican plague of 1928-32.

Most of the little magazines that appeared before the advent of Poetry and The Little Review vere not too serious and often allotted space for satiric and even occasional nonsense verse. Poets now were practically forced to abandon that medium of expression, since the quality magazines had never bought heavily of light verse. Not that it was at all a question of market. The little magazines seldom, if ever, paid for anything, and the bards, for the most part, barded for the fun of it, But the Liberator, which succeeded the old cavorting Masses, and the later expatriate publications such as Broom, Secession, transition, This Quarter and Pound's Exile, had no room for anything except tragic groans in vers libre.

What a contrast we find in the magazines of thirty-five to forty years ago! There was Puck, edited by Bunner, Mlle. New York, with Huneker

GRIM FOLLIES OF A MINOR COURT

by ELEANOR ROWLAND WEMBRIDGE

THERE is often a fantastic drama in the workings of a minor court that is missing in the sessions devoted to the major crimes. If a knife, let us there might be some chance of getting it." She say, has entirely severed someone's jugular vein, the criminal court neets the episode with all the gravity appropriate to the abrupt thrust of a soul into eternity. Lawyers, judges, witnesses, police, are summoned. Oaths are administered, precedents consulted, sentences pronounced. The outcome may result in another fatality added to the first, but at least life and death are taken seriously. Murder is accorded its due respect. Let us suppose, however, that the knife, flung with an equally savage passion, but less accurate aim, misses its target's neck and, glancing sidewise against the stove, falls harmlessly into the wood-box. Half an inch has removed the incident from the august consideration of the higher courts to an obscure hearing, where a fine or a scolding takes the place of a cell or the electric | inky tub. chair. In both cases murder was in the air. But the deflected blade has turned the affair from the grim to the grotesque. There is something almost more disturbing to one's moral sense about the undervaluation of the knife that did not meet its mark than in the ominous appraisal of the one that did! In my modest chambers-I am the eferce of the uvenile Court of Cuyahoga County, Ohio--there is no warning ahead of what wild mischief I am to consider. There cannot be much fore-knowledge of minor cares. One moment, let us say, I have never heard of Vennie, her half-sister, her grandfather, and the barber who lodges in the hall. After fifteen minutes, with no grandeur of the law invoked (because Vennie is a poor shot), I know more about them all than anyone should know, except possibly their doctor and their confessor. Old scandals, jealousies and reprisals are chattered to me by Vennie, her sister, and the barber, while made attractively warmer by cheap and convenient grandpa shakes his head and says it inn't so. No highballs. one this side of doomsday will discover which is ight.

Vennie's story is that the fight started over an incalled-for comment by the barber as to the virtue of the half-sister's grandmother. Words passed and Vennie picked up the knife and threw it, in order to forestall being choked by the barber. The neighhors heard the noise and sent for the police. But, when the patrol wagon arrived, no one was visible but the panting barber, reading his newspaper by the stove. He protested that there had been no trouble, merely a friendly chat, and that the family had gone up-stairs at peace with all the world, including him. He believed them to be on the roof. Why the roof?" I inquired of the grandfather. To escape the barber?" "Oh no," explained the old gentleman blandly. "On the roof to shoot pigeons!" Nothing could budge any of them from this statement. If Vennie had tossed her weapon with a more practised hand, she would have made the front page as a major criminal. Because her ain was poor, the affair has dwindled to a family party playfully shooting pigeons on the roof at midnight, and with Vennie and her erstwhile hated barber quite obviously engaged in a flirtation.

It seems shocking that crime missed by so narrow a margin should turn burlesque. The collapse of he combat into this anti-climax is almost more monstrous than the barber in the morgue!

only his victim but a wife and two children. He are unheard of. Popular relaxation takes the form had no money and was literally not worth the of communal barbecues, an occasional lynching bee energy necessary to track him down, even if we | flogging, and the quadrennial elections, had known his last name, which the girl could not recall. His first was Frog. I gazed at the bedraggled little wretch in helpless despair, then asked, "What do you want? If I knew what you really wanted, smiled. But, accustomed as I should be by now to whimsies and lunacies, I was startled by her answer. "I want a green and black bathroom," she murmured.

"A green and black bathroom?" I echoed, staring.

"Yes. I saw a picture of one once, and it had a black tub. I want a green and black bathroom with a black tub!"

I fell back, inadequate to her bright vision. I could only mutter, "I am sorry. I have no black tub," as she was ushered to an obscure bed, and thence I know not where. On the lowest rung of the human ladder. Yet, her only smile was at the dream-picture of a glittering bathroom and an

I insist that such encounters in the humble sessions of a minor court make a heavier drain on one's social philosophy than a concourse of the League of Nations.

THE OTHER SIDE OF PARADISE

By VERNON C. SHERWIN

THE peninsula of Florida protrudes from the southeastern corner of the United States into the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean like an index finger dipped into a tepid bath. To varied thousands, ranging from tin can tourists in housecars and khaki breeches to harried Crœsuses who feel they are no longer able to relax in the spas of southern Europe, the state is just that : a warm bath

A native, however, gazing pensively at a map of his state is more likely to be reminded of one of the pendulous mammæ of a range cow, the islands dripping into the Gulf from the southernmost end of the state representing the last drops of milk grudgingly released by an animal ripe for the abattoir. Alcoholically the state is wet enough; economically it has been milked dry.

Laying claim to the oldest settlement in the Union, Florida might well be expected to have attained a maturity incompatible with a double life, but such is not the case. The triangle of the old lady's girlish senility has at its apex the freeborn white native, who roams the northern and western reaches of the state, the Cracker, who controls her political destinies and looking after such morals as still survive.

Perhaps no state in the Union displays so great a contrast as exists between north and south Florida. The differences are cultural, moral and ethnological. The southern section of Florida, given over to the entertainment of tourists and the cult of the sun, is ruled in the main by an immigrant Babbittry, attracted by the fantastic paper profits made in real estate speculation in 1925 and 1926. In the vicinity of Miami and other tourist centres there are overtones of a cosmopolitan culture visible

Jacksonville, considered the leading city of the state by everyone except Miamians, was the scene of the highly publicized sweatbox murder trial in the Summer of 1932, which resulted in a twenty. year sentence for a prison camp boss but has as rebrought no startling reforms in the penal system of the state. The publicity given to the revolting details of this murder of a young convict from New Jerrer was probably a contributing factor to the convic tion. Had there been any real feeling in the state against the brutal treatment of convicts, the case of Martin Tabor, beaten to death in a prison camp more than six years ago, should have provided sufficient warning that a reform was in order.

More recently five men were acquitted on charges of flogging several men and women in Jacksonville, despite positive identification. Convenient relatives and lodge brothers provided alibis for the defendants. Although more than twenty-five lacksonville men and women reported to the police that they had been abducted and beaten with heavy straps last year, no arrests, other than the five mentioned above, have been made. Most of the victims stated they were warned against frequenting "dis orderly houses and living in the Negro district of the city."

Among the onerous duties willingly shouldered by the politically-minded Cracker is that of custodian of the moral and spiritual welfare of his fellow citizens. In the field of endeavor he is aided and abetted in the resort section of the state by as able and active a crew of non-indigenous whoopers up as is to be found outside of Kansas.

III

The geographical position of the common wealth makes Florida ideal not only for the harddrinking, sun-loving Pan worshippers; the place is also a sort of pre-paradise for arthritic clergymen from all points of the compass. While the actinic rays of the Winter sun draw the swelling from their joints, they lick their Christian chops as they contemplate the appalling moral turpitude of less God-fearing visitors. Where else, this side of Paradise, if even there, may a Servant of God lie in the heliotherapic atmosphere of a populous beach, simultaneously ridding himself of rheumatic twinges and preparing a sermon on the devilish seductiveness of the one-piece bathing suit?

Do the business men of the resorts demand a liberal interpretation of the statutes as an attraction to free-spending visitors? Then a pack of amateur and professional bluenoses are on their trail, shouting and praying for strict enforcement of the puritanical regulations of antebellum days, including Sunday closing laws for every institution except, of course, the church,

Do the tourists ask for dog and horse racing? Then the Crackers of the state legislature convene with palms conveniently upturned, equally ready for a pourboire or a prayer. There was considerable speculation among residents when the Florida legis lature, after many refusals, suddenly legalized pari mutuel betting under a local option law, after wink ing at illicit oral betting for five years,

Two years earlier the same august body had hitched up its galluses and fled precipitately, spray-custom can each one of them be broken under certain circumstances with justice. From the earliest times these mmandments have never been taken seriously 1/ free men.

Nature is strong, has sound nerves, and is not troubled by conscience. Selfish behavior, unselfish behavior, it is all one to her, not the difference of a cherry stone. She performs her multiform tasks without hesitation or misgiving, in a state of innocence, apart from all knowledge of good and evil. When a butcher bird transfixes upon the pegs of its larder creatures more sensitive, nature remains indifferent. When a wandering Jew, possessed by a treacherous delusion, sacrifices himself with heroic passion, nature remains utterly unimplicated. For all she knew, the most tragic and significant cry that has ever disturbed a Spring twilight-Eloi, Eloi Lama Sabachthani-might have come from the glutted throat of some hideous hyena crunching the bones of a scrupulous Pharisce in the valley of Jehoshophat.

To her flat ears the frightful murmur that rose from the battle fields of Flanders when bands of regimented primates, with memory and prevision, bit, scratched, and stabbed at each other, was no different from the murmur that rises from a green orchard where boys and girls are dancing to the music of fiddles. The Persian sovereign who, to satisfy his lust for revenge, had silver trays piled high with the eyes of his enemies carried past him from dawn to noon was no more condemned by nature than was John Huss commended. Whether we like it or not, we must accustom our minds to accept the fact that moral action has no philosophic justification and still less a supernatural one. It represents a capricious humor of mankind, it is an artificial toy of their own invention and nothing more. Morality has no tap-root in earth life, of this we may be certain.

Because we should put our sanctimonious convictions under the sharp teeth of the harrow of skepticism, it by no means follows that we advocate the abandonment of all difficult self-control. For the sake of life we must never tire in our fight against stupidity and cruelty. If we are unable to vindicate this attitude with rational arguments we must learn to live, as the Christians teach, by faith. In a last analysis it is simply a matter of taste.

With regard to our personal conduct here and as one of its stars, the Chap Book, Burgess' Lark The Yellow Book, Cosmopolis, and a host of big and little magazines, most of them eagerly receptive to the work of such technical experts as Richard Hovey, Guy Wetmore Carryl, Bliss Carman, Oliver Herford and Gelett Burgess, as well as lesser figures such as Kenyon Cox, John Kendrick Bangs, Charles F. Lummis and Carolyn Wells. How much of their product do we remember and quote today aside from the well-milked "Purple Cow?" Unless one is a literary historian or a collector of first editions, one is probably acquainted only with the caudal examples, such as Riley's threnody to the outhouse and Field's "When Willie Wet The Bed,"-things of the type that are reprinted by the leg-and-chemise magazines.

Today? Well, there are a few (a very few) who amuse and entertain occasionally. For instance, Morris Bishop, Arthur Lippmann, E. B. Crosswhite and that wholesaler of jingles, Berton Braley, who evidently operates on a yearly contract basis with the Saturday Evening Post. And we must not forget the shrinking Samuel Hoffenstein and the ubiquitous Dorothy Parker

But we must still admit, much as we may dislike to, that our best practising technician is Ogden Nash, even when it is apparent that all his tricks were used by Hovey, Carryl and others nearly forty years ago. In Hovey's "Don Juan" (Smart Set. Nov. 1900) are found Nash's own rhymes-"please men" with "policemen", "Ellinor" with "hell in her," "satyriasis" with "your bias is," and even the Nashian distortion of spelling in "Lucifer" with "crucifer." Nash must have carelessly read Carryl's 'Grimm Tales Made Gay," because he was once guilty of rhyming "wittier" with "Whittier" and overlooking Carryl's redeeming pun. But the imitator has been flattered in turn. One of his early satellites was Margaret Fishback, who now has moved into an orbit of her own and writes capable verse in carload lots. She has reformed, but there are plenty of others who have not. A contributor to one of the leading humorous magazines recently copied, almost word for word, two of Nash's verses.

Of writers of nonsense verse there are today none to compare with Carryl, Herford, Burgess, Cox and Carolyn Wells. Carolyn Wells, Herford and Burgess are, I believe, still with us, but the fact that they no longer write intentional nonsense now we must always bear in our minds the doctrine shows either that they are incapable of doing it Often real calamity develops before our eyes, yet, though we foresee it, we are helpless to prevent it. There was Aggie Lou, who presented herself to the police with a grave complaint against her brotherin-law, which bore all the ear-marks of truth. No child of thirteen could have invented such shocking charges, nor was there any motive for her doing so. All the investigators agreed that her story was true. She was ministered to, her mother summoned, and the two met with sobs. But after the interview a new glint apprared in the eye of Aggie Lou. She insisted that he brother-in-law was a good kind man, and that all the stories she had told were lies. She was vague as to her motives in inventing such monstrosities, but persisted in her statements that she had done so.

As the family filed in for the hearing, I had to stare hard even to recognize them. The father, with oiled hair and a glistening new gold tooth, was resplendent in a tan overcoat, while the mother was draped in green satin with glass beads. Aggie Lou sat beside them, with a ticket to Chicago in her hand; and the brother-in-law, fat, sleek and silent, eyed me with a covert smile. At our first meeting, the family was being fed by charity. Today, Aggie Lou had a long shopping list, and feared to miss the train because of it. "Where did all this money come from?" I demanded in futile wrath, though I knew very well. "That man paid all of you to change your story," I insisted, in shrill contrast to the composed father, who murmured that he had "friends," and the confident brother-inlaw, who smiled and gazed out of the window. Aggie Lou grasped her ticket and reiterated faintly, 'No one done nothing to me." What higher court has time or patience for the tremulous falsehoods of children? As for Aggie Lou's family, what is a daughter's virtue compared to the tangible benefits of a fawn-colored overcoat and a green satin dress? Such gifts are not to be despised by those who live on charity. So the fat brother-in-law waddles out, with the serene composure of a philanthropist who scatters sunshine-and Aggie Lou, despite our best efforts, travels happily off to her destruction.

Occasionally a frail creature epitomizes in herself every conceivable mischance. One such drifted into our court-room, young, sick and pregnant. Her mother was dead, her father had long since deserted, of Epicurus that we are endowed with a modicum | any longer or that the public taste has changed. and her one-time admirer had departed, leaving not through the fog of go-getters and boosters but, as is always true where numerical greatness is confused with progress, the enlightened few are sadly in the minority and lead, at best, a life of vicarious pleasure.

In more prosperous days concert artists of the first water were brought into Miami and Orlando by a venturesome entrepreneur and once, during the height of his fad, the Spanish painter Zuloaga mildly shocked the good ladies of the former city with an exhibition of his nudes. Of late, however, appreciation of the arts appears to be in the doldrums. Kreisler and Heifetz fiddle no more on Miami's shore, and the Spaniard was the last painter heard of in the land. The composer Mana-Zucca, married to the former owner of a Miami department store, is making a conscientious effort to keep interest alive in music in the Magic City and the Civic theatre carries on, but with difficulty.

That the love of beautiful letters is not dead is evidenced by a virulent rash of poets which has broken out in the state during the past few years Euterpe and Erato are wooed by such unexpected aspirants as policemen and matrons of homes for the poor, and the appalling results are published in an anthology of Florida poets. Published, that is, after the poetasters subscribe for ten copies of the volume at two dollars each.

In the main however, Babbittry is in the saddle in south Florida, and any surplus energy these enterprising gentlemen may possess is expended in a valiant effort to avoid payment of the over burdening load of bonded indebtedness contracted during the real estate boom, without using the opprobrious term "repudiation." In the city of West Palm Beach their efforts have resulted in the bondholders forcing a tax levy of 450 mills on an already bankrupt populace. No man can predict the outcome of this unheard of tax rate. It remains to seen whether property owners will abandon town site or rise in revolt. Only one thing is certain few, if any, of the property holders can pay a such amount as the levy will entail this year.

Π

The northern and western stretches of t state, with their sweatboxes and other penal atro ities, present a far different picture. There t towns remain uncontaminated by Yankee emigr and the land is given over to agriculture rather the subdivisions. The arts are not only neglected, they ing the adjacent scenery with a fine jet of Brown's Mule en route, when a Miami racing promoter descended on the capital with the announcement that he was prepared to buy up the whole assemblage, body and soul, in the interests of legalized gambling.

By a God-given act of wisdom on the part of some early Solon, the state legislature is allowed to convene only once in two years. Thus was facilitated another two years of illegal gambling at the tracks before a group of less garrulous promoters could visit the boys at Tallahassee and make them see the light. This time there was no vulgar talk of a headright for representatives. The conversation was confined to betting for public, rather than private, revenue, and a local option gambling bill went through. Governor Carlton vetoed the bill, but, so convinced had the legislators become that racing for revenue would prove to be the state's salvation. that the bill was passed over his veto. So after six years it became legal to back one's judgment on the relative speed of thoroughbreds at the track. but it remains to this day a felonious offense to do the same thing in a bookmaking establishment

The snoopers wailed and beat their breasts and predicted disaster for a state so far gone in sin, but their law-giving colleagues went placidly to their homes, content in the knowledge that their fleabitten counties would get an equal share of racing profits.

downtown.

Since the legalization of pari-mutuel betting, ministers of the Gospel have had to content them selves with harassing slot-machine operators, gaudy women and other such small fry, but the resort cities still present probably the most inspiring field for the reformer to be found in the land.

be he	THE AMERICAN SPECTATOR 12 East 41st Street, New York City n: Iy	Enclosed find $(check, cash, money order) for One Year's subscription to THE AMERICAN SPECTATOR, to begin with the issue,
ne	Name
c-	Address
és In	$1.25 in U. S. and possessions $1.75 elsewhere

THE CONTROL OF SEX by CALVIN B. BRIDGES

 $T_{able importance to King X}$, whom Providence had blessed the five daughters in a row. There was nothing he could do bet it, and possibly there isn't yet, although at the recent Third ternational Congress of Genetics a Doctor Sanders made a out concerning some experiments conducted by a colleague which a nearly uniform production of boys followed the feed-, to the mother of an alkali (sodium bicarbonate) during J idical period before conception. And, conversely, a great preattance of daughters was reported to follow the administraon of lactic acid.

Whether or not the sex ratio in man can be controlled. barteory experiments with the small fly Drosofii Melanogaster pr shown that in this form at any rate the ratio of the sexes a families can be governed by genetical means to an astonishing stent. So far, however, no chemical treatment of environmental brations has modified the sex-ratio significantly.

The genetical methods of controlling the sex-ratio in the use of the fly mentioned consist in the main of killing in the er early larval stages, of individuals of one or the other sex the killing is accomplished by the transmission to certain indithats in the family of definitely inherited character changes Pese characteristics differ from the other characteristics, known inherited traits, in this fly only in the more devastating and side effect upon the ability to live. For example, the inherited macteristic of white eyes may appear in half of the sons of certain family, but the while eye does not harm the recipient Fit. Hence no more of these white-eyed sons than of the normal edeved sons die. So the sex-ratio remains what is normal for bis species: one to one. But other inherited characters, instead s being harmless, may be very harmful. Thus, a certain merited character consists in the transformation of certain mans of the very young larva into rounded masses of black ells, very similar in their manner of growth and in their fata! ficts to the maliguant melanotic cancers found in man. Since these families one half of the sons receive this character and - ne of the daughters receive it, half of the sons are eliminated and the family shows the reduced sex-ratio of only fifty sons each one-hundred daughters.

We know the explanation for this curious type of inheritice, whereby a given character appears in half of the sons of family and in none of the daughters. It is because sex itself is symmed by the existence in the cells of the body of a growthrea of one, or conversely of two, particular chromosomes called the x-chromosomes. A larva with one x-chromosome a male and a larva with two becomes a female. When a female alas and lays eggs, each egg contains the one or the other these two x chromosomes. In the case of the male, when he mis sperms, half of the sperms receive his x-chromosome,

Extra Money chipps you at the solwould be glad know that during past yoar my ring from now-ring from now-ring from now-ring from now-ring from now-ring from now-ring from no the sol you no the the pot no the the 100 Mas I. Harland How do you KNOW you can't WRITE? Have you ever tried? James Branch Cabell Have you ever attempted even the a lit of training under competent. a shance?

Or have you been sitting back, as is so easy to do, waiting for the P D. H. Lawrence while the other half of the sperms are left without an x-chromosome. Fertilization of the eggs, each of which has an x-chromosome, by the two kinds of sperm results in two kinds of larvæ, those with two x-chromosomes becoming females and those with one x-chromosome-the other half-becoming males. The result is that normally as many sons as daughters are produced.

П

In the case of characters such as white-eyes and the fatal cancers, the particular bit of chemical called a gene, which results in the white-eyed instead of the red-eyed condition, is a part of this sex-determining x-chromosome. A female that has this specific gene in one only of her two x-chromosomes is able to live, since she does not develop the cancer. But those males which have this cancer-bearing x-chromosome only, since they are not protected by a second and normal x-chromosome, develop the cancer and die from its effects. By combinations of certain of these death-producing genes with certain other ones, half of the sons can be killed by one of them and the other half by the other. Hence, families consisting only of daughters can be raised. If families consisting of a very few sons and many daughters are desired, they can be obtained by combining particular ones of these male-climinating genes with particular other ones from our large selection of death-dealing genes.

Reciprocally, genes are known whose peculiarity of action causes death to daughters and not to sons.

Not only can the scale of sex-ratios be run from one extreme o the other in families, but individuals can be produced which, in themselves, are combinations of male and female in various but specific proportions. Thus, one individual can be entirely and sharply female throughout the left side of its body and just as sharply male throughout the right side. Since the male is only about two-thirds as large as the female, the combination is ludicrously curved-he being the string to her bow. In other cases, approximately a quadrant of the joint body is male. In many cases, half of the head is male and half female. In such instances the fly may exhibit a mixed libido. The tail region containing the testes or ovaries may have more effect on the sex behavior than the head region, as evidenced by "their" pursuit of females or "their" being pursued by males.

In other experiments, besides the two fixed points of maleness and femaleness, the interval between can be filled by a whole series of individuals, each being a definite intermediate or inter-sex between maleness and femaleness. In these intersexes, the sex constitution of every cell in the body is intermediate. But in the developmental process, the organs become more femalelike in appearance than in the standard male, and the proportion of organs thus becoming female-like determines the grade of inter-sex. Again, the maleness of all the organs may be accentuated to give a series of super-male individuals. Conversely, the scale of sexes can be extended in the opposite direction to a series of super-females. Thus, the entire range between extreme super-females through standard females, inter-sexes of different degrees, standard males and thence on to the extreme of super males, is producable on demand.

Do you want a moral? If so, here it is: Work relatively as long with the study of heredity in man as has been done in the heredity of flies, and then, if you wish, like results can be produced in man.

IN PRAISE OF COOKERY by HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

WHEN I was very young, I, like all other well-behaved little V Dutch boys, was regularly dragged to a bare and dreary room, atrociously ventilated and adorned with a few antiquated maps of Palestine, where I was soundly instructed in the history of the ancient Hebrews according to the views of Dr. John Calvin, late prophet-in-extraordinary to the patient people of the town of Geneva, Switzerland. Every lesson was full of

'burnt offerings" which, according to our excellent Dominie, sound Voltairians, who had sent me to my weekly catechism not in a spirit of piety but in order to have me out of the house for an extra couple of hours, frowned severely upon this unwelcome and wholly unsuspected manifestation of an interest in outworn "prejudice and superstition."

I escaped further punishment by a most solemn vow that henceforth I would not take the sacred writings either too seriously or too literally, one of the few promises I have kept to this day without any serious infringements, and that was the last of my efforts along the line of empirical ancient-testamentary testimony.

II

A few years later, when entering the glorious portals of immortal Homer, I was slightly shocked to discover that the Greek Gods had also been devotees of the hideous smell of fried meat. By that time, Jehovah had become a slightly ridiculous and wholly antiquated patriarch, vaguely reminiscent of those hoarybearded rabbis who would pass through our streets whenever the Little Father of the great Russian plains had indulged in another little pogrom, when vast hordes of bewhiskered and bedraggled ghetto-folk would come scurrying through our streets in search of the blessed ships that were to carry them to the Promised Land on the other side of the broad Atlantic Ocean.

The Olympians, on the other hand, men and women of the world, with their serious devotion to all outdoor sports and their amorous adventures that smacked of the French funny papers, were as modern as this evening's Extra, and it seemed absolutely incongruous that they too should have asked their worshippers to refresh and delight them with the vapors of slowly smouldering carcasses. But Homer's words alloved of no mistake. Nectar and ambrosia sounded most impressive. When our zoology teacher showed us the mummified remnants of the ambrosian beetle (a rare American import) which had derived its name from the strange habit of cultivating a juicy fungus inside the bark of trees as a special delicacy for its promising young larvae, the last vestiges of my former respect for the Jovian bill-of-fare disappeared as completely as my erstwhile fear of the late Jehovah. I came to the definite conclusion that the tastes of our ancestors must have been very different from our own, and I let it go at that.

No doubt a hundred years hence, one of my full-fed great grandchildren, in writing in The American Spectator of 2033 about his antiquarian experiments with a Roosevelt-steak smothered in onions, will express a similar devastating dislike for the delicacies which now grace our domestic tables. For the perfume of today is the insufferable stench of tomorrow, and the same food which made Charlemagne ask for a fifth helping would be merely kennel-ration to the gourmet of 1933, and would only remind him of that cup of luke-warm tea mixed with ranci 1 goat-butter which his delighted host had urged upon him when he was forced to take shelter in the house of a Tibetan lama.

Whosoever doubts my words is politely requested to make a culinary voyage of discovery through the metropolis in which I am writing these words, to wit, the city of New York, the greatest renaissance village of our modern world, the sublime crazy-quilt of all nations, all races, all tribes and all clans, which has a larger variety of truly "regional" restaurants than any other town on this or any other planet. Being myself of an almost incredible conservatism in the matter of "taste" (the kitchen of my childhood was excellent but almost as restricted as that of the rice-fed babies of India), I humbly partake of bread and butter and the wings of some defunct chicken, while my friends delve deep into the hidden delights of some Turkish, Armenian or Hindu mess. But everything man ever ate, should eat or should refrain completely from eating, from the succulent fingers of the octopus (cepholopoda vulgaris) to the hundredyear-old eggs of the Chinese are there for the asking.

Whale-meat is no longer a rare delicacy since Sears-Roebuck undertook to preserve it and distribute it en gros. But the edible spiritual and material confiiscation. They deprived (without compensation) the brewer of his malt vats and overnight they destroyed the California vintners to make a Chicago holiday for the gangster and the grafter. As a by-product of their fury, they forced all our first rate French chefs to return to the land of their nativity, "For how," asked the worthy gentlemen, and quite justly, "can one cook without wines, without Madeira, and without sherries of diverse and rare vintages?"

The deserted ruins of our glorious gastronomic edifice were at once occupied by the hygiene-hawkers. The old sauce-pans and the copper cauldrons of the departed Gauls were filled with vitamines (A, B, C) and calories (D, E, F) and the din of the "balanced diets" resounded nightly through the cavernous caravanseries, where solemn-faced and sterilized attendants operated upon us for our appetites, without paying the slightest attention to the æsthetic necessities of our long-suffering souls.

The last straw came when cellophane was invented. The food that was then thrown at us was guaranteed "never to have been touched by human hands." "God help us! No human hands should ever have touched it. It was fit only for those contented and happy cows who were producing ten pints of milk on only four cubes of highly compressed alfalfa.

I am in great hopes these days. Another year of the Depression and we shall be a happy nation. Instead of devoting all our wakeful hours to the main problem of how to make a living, we may be also tempted to try and discover how to live. We are still a long way from the times of Louis the Well-Beloved, who bestowed the blue ribbon of the Royal Order of the Holy Spirit upon the first French female cook who had demonstrated that she knew her onions quite as well as most of her male competitors. But soon we may begin to realize that a single sardine in the hards of an artist has more nutritious virtues than a dozen Porterhouse steaks maltreated by an indifferent pot-walloper in a Pullman kitchen, and that the making of a perfect omelet is quite as difficult and just as deserving of high praise as the construction of a new gearless car. Instead of a peppy lunch of ice-cold half-and-half, followed by a pint of cream-smothered coffee and an ounce of bicarbonate, we once more may devote a couple of hours to the noon-time meal, though it may cost us only fifty cents and may offend against all the laws of the dietary specialists.

We have the experience of twenty centuries at our elbows. We can draw upon the entire universe for our raw materials, for the stuff is almost being given away these days. The refrigerator has done away with waste. The bilious, high-powered executive has gone the way of the Russian grandees and the Dodo. At last we have a clear field.

The subject is so vast that one must either write a ponderous tome or a very short essay. The lack of space demands the short essay. Do not consider these remarks, oh reader, as the last word upon a topic that may mean life and death to you. Rather take it as a little appetizer, a humble hors d'œuvre, to your own resolution to be done with mere feeding, to eschew the ways of the gourmand, the stuffing glutton, and to practice the arts of the gourmet, the amiable connoisseur of the good things of this earth, which it has pleased Almighty Heaven to place at our disposal, in such multifarious and multivariant abundance.

During the Crimean War when, because of a hopelessly mismanaged commissary department, the allies outside of Sevastopol were reduced to a meagre daily ration of a few mildewed beans, the chef de cuisine of General Canrobert invented a Pudding à la Malakoff, which kept the French armies in high spirits, while the British groused away on their murderous diet of soggy, boiled beans.

Out of the present mess there may arise a Bread Pudding à la Franklin Delano which shall make coming generations regard the Depression as the beginning of our culinary redemption. Let us pray!

by to come some time when you awaken, all of a sudden, to the covery, "I am a writer"? If the latter course is the one of at choosing, you probably never, . i ante It is seldom that anyone becomes a stiter until he (or she) has been your for some time. That is why many authors and writers spring out of the newspaper business. Be day-to-day necessity of writing -of gathering material about which write -develops their talent, their right, their background and their lence as nothing else could. That is why the Newspaper Insti-C of America bases its writing ornuction on journalism-continu-3 writing-the training that has induced so many successful authors.

Learn to write by writing

Natosper Institute training is based the New York Copy-Deak Michod. It and Respa you writing in your own to a poir own tine. Week by week his regive actual assignments, just as if the rest of the structure of a cost matter An your own tinn. Week by week it receive actual assignments, just as if its receive actual assignments, just as its dill. Your writing is individually incide and constructively criticized. A first and constructively criticized of interaction. Inder such sympathetic filter, you will find that (instead of usity trying to copy some one clas's ritics tricks) you are rapidly develop-it your own distinctive, self-flavored the indergoing an experience that has starll to it and which at the same time dualogs in you the power to make your fellings articulate. Wany people who should he writing for little thought to the $25, $50 and ito at more that can often be earned by material that takes little time to its aports, recipes, etc.--things that its aily be turned out in leisure hours. at othen on the impulse of the moment.

How you start

Mrs. Mur

Address

4H 368

We have propared a unique Writing appliede Test. This tells you whether you pares the fundamental qualities meca-tary to successful writing—acute ob-tration, dramatic instinct, creative im-stantion, etc. You'll enjoy taking this bit. The coupon will bring it without bilication, Newspaper Institute of Amer-14, 1176 Broadway, New York. Newspaper Institute of America. 1776 Broadway, New York Send ma, without cost or obligation, your IEsting Aptitude Test and fur-ther information about writing for Profit, as promised in American Spec-tator, August.

....................... (All correspondence confide tist. No salesman will call on you.)

Anatole France Dostoyevsky Norman Douglas John Dos Passos Hendrik Van Loon W. Somerset Maugham

THE

MODERN

LIBRARY

Offers You

the Outstanding Books of

Eugenc O'Neill

Theodore Dreiser

Sinclair Lewis

Ernest Hemingway

William Faull ner

James Joyce

Complete, Unabridged Editions, Well Printed and Handsomely Bound

95 Cents a Copy FOR SALE EVERYWHERE Send for a Complete List of

225 Titles

MODERN LIBRARY, INC. 20 E. 57th St., New York

Please send me your list of titles, including important additions for Summer, 1933.

NAME

ADDRESS

concerning advertising in THE AMERICAN SPEC-TATOR may be obtained from the Advertising Manager, Miss Amy Vanderbilt, 12 East 41st Street, New York City. Telephone LExington 2-0734. This is the first issue to carry advertising copy.

Rates and information

had been so acceptable to the nostrils of the Great Jehovah that he had preferred them to all other visible forms of homage.

Now the Dutch expression for "burnt offering" was "smelly offering" but the word "smelly" was used in the old sense of "perfumed"-in other words, it indicated a more or less agreeable smell. Being, even then, rather empirically inclined, I decided one day to play the rôle of Jehovah and to arrange such an offering according to the best Hebrew precepts and then enjoy those pleasures which had so delighted the olefactory organs of the Great Master of the Divine Tantrums, for whom, in those days, I had a profound if awesome respect.

On the plea that I wanted to give Philax an extra treat (Philax was a fat and wheezy pug-dog, now gone the way of all pug-dogs) I obtained a few odds and ends of meat from our family butcher. In the back of the garden I had erected an altar according to the specifications as found in Exodus XX:24-good wet earth and a few flat stones, carried to our low country a million years before by an obliging Scandinavian glacier and never polluted by the touch of a human hammer.

I had carefully refrained from constructing any steps, "that my nakedness be not discovered thereon," because I failed to know what that meant. All decent little Dutch boys wore pants and their nakedness was never discovered unless they got spanked, and surely one would not get spanked for building an altar according to Exodus XX: 24. I had neither "sheep nor oxen" but I had a large plate-full of their choicest entrails and old newspapers would provide me with fuel. The fuel question rather worried me. Exodus XX was silent on that point. But I had been careful to collect a large number of copies of the Dutch Church News-a wondrous gazette consisting exclusively of an nouncements about forthcoming sermons and "help wanted" ads for the benefit of ladies who wished to avail themselves of the services of a decent, self-respecting Protestant cook in exchange for forty dollars a year, full washing and tips-and I felt certain that out of respect for the word "church" Jehovah would overlook any possible minor errors connected with the actual process of combustion. I had a vague notion that holy offerings should be brought while the suppliant was still in a state of pre-prandial sobriety, possible remnant of the days when my ancestors had worshipped in a somewhat different temple, and so, early one morning, I sneaked out of the house and set fire to the contraption. It stank to high Heaven. Pardon the use of this homely Anglo-Saxon expression but "smell" and "odor," "emanation" and 'fume" are entirely too mild to describe the ensuing stench.

It was Summer and the pole-cat fragrance rolled in heavy waves toward the house and caused several members of the family to arise in haste and to inquire whether the cow-barn was on fire. The gardener, with a bucket of water, made an end to all my further experiments in applied holiness. My parents, book of the Bolshevists, started upon their little career of birds' nests of the Javanese cliffs, all the snails that ever delighted the Gallic whiskers of our late allies and associates, and the fried lambs' eyes of the Kurdistan highlands are available for the benefit of the true connoisseur.

III

An article like this is not easy to write. The classical tradition of the American philosophy of life is very decidedly opposed to the idea of paying too much attention to what one eats. Like a too great proficiency at billiards, a too profound familiarity with the doctrines of Brillat-Savarin has ever been considered an indication of a misspent youth. The stern Calvinistic deities ge the Founding Fathers insisted that one swallow whatever was put "before one" as if it were part of the doctrine of infant damnation or trans-substantiation. The fact (a contributory fact of economic origin) that the greater part of all our domestic cooks during half a century were recruited from among the race that had never learned to prepare a more elaborate dish than stew and boiled potatoes made matters worse. Irish cooking may have done wonders for Sinn Féin, but that is about all I can say in its favor. For a short space of time, a ray of hope illumined the culinary sky of our fair land. As long as New Orleans was the capital of a separate empire, the influence of Bechamel and Vatel and of the Duc de Richelieu (the human benefactor who discovered mayonnaise) made itself felt among the dusky chieftains who held sway in the kitchens of the cotton and slave magnates. But Grant, who was a heavy and indiscriminate feeder, conquered Lee, who knew the difference between eating and dining, and during the scramble for riches that followed upon our domestic Night of St. Bartholomew, the noble art of cooking fell upon evil days.

A menu of the Seventies and Eighties reads like a sermon of Cotton Mather. There was a lot of it, but only the strongest constitution could hope to survive these cannibal feasts of our sovereigns by the grace of oil and coal and iron.

Gradually, however, when bigger and better vessels made a trip across the the ocean a little less of a torment than it had been during the days of Charles Dickens and Anthony Trollope, our hardy pioneers of good living and clear thinking ventured forth once more into that distant but delectable wilderness of Europe which had nourished (in more ways than one) the Unumal rented founders of the Great Republic. Thirty years ago New York and an increasing number of American cities had a large variety of restaurants as good as any that were to be found in Paris or Vienna or Warsaw.

Came the dusk of the Eighteenth Amendment. The embattled nay-sayers, the disinherited folk of the sterile New England farms, now grown rich among the fertile opulence of the mid-western wheat-farms, taking a premature leaf out of the old man!

Classified Advertising

General Items he Collector's Journal is published quarterly for those interested in first editions, old magazines, newspapers. Americana, piaybills, autographs, prints, dime novels, sheet music, etc. $1 yearly; 30 cents a copy. 465 South Detroit St., Los Angeles, Cal. Third Successful year. Successful year.

You're not old, of course. It's just an affectionate term used by your good friends-and you like to hear them say it,

We, too, are flattered when house". In point of fact, we're the most modern hotel in Boston, but we like the expression

because it recalls the glorious history of this famous hostelry, which for more than two gen erations has provided guests with comfortable shelter and good food. Yes, the Parker House is a new building, of-Flouse is a new building, of fering every modern improve-mentand the choicest in cuisine, accommodations, service and location, but it will always be "the old Parker House" to its friends. We want it so.

Glenwood J. Shervard President and

Managing Director

Plenty of single rooms with bath at $3

arker

House

TARMONT AND SCHOOL STREET

Professional Instruction tory writers, novelists diagnosed, criti cized, trained or thrown out, especially those who think it can't be done. Fif teen years experience insulting authors Write or telephone for information THOMAS H. UZZELL ew York Cit 842 Madison Ave. New Vanderbilt 8-1245

WRITERS' GUILD OF NEW YORK Whiteks Goldbord Rew John 25 Fifth Avenue, offers complete analy-sis and criticism of any manuscript, not over 10,000 words, for $5. Read-ing and market opinion without charge. Nominal fee for extensive marketing acruice service

First Editions stalogue of 1,250 first editions at moder ate prices sent at request. Book furnished on any special subject. Rich ard S. Wormser, 22 W. 48th St., N. Y

BENJAMIN HAUSER, 300 Madison Ave. N. Y. FIRST EDITIONS, Especially Fine. Catalog issued. Unusual Books Catalogue of Unusual Books, fully illu-trated, sent free to a select clientely in requesting catalogue, kindly giv age and occupation. We reserve the right to refuse any request. ARNOLI BOOK SERVICE, INC., P. O. Box 4 Station D, New York City.

Anthropology

Remington Prints Six Frederick Remington artist's proof in original Collier folder. Three per fect condition, three fair. Appraised by leading gallery at $300. Will sell privately, $100. Guaranteed in my possession since publication. Address Box 107. The American Spectator. SHINO'S INO'N'

Professional Services MANUSCRIPT TYPING SERVICE-MAN uscripts excellently typed, revised, criti-intelligent personal attention The circulation of The cized; intelligent personal attention Pauline Resnikoff, 113 W. 42d., N. Y. C American Spectator this Unusual and curious books can now be rented for 50c or $1.00, send for cata-logue today. Books on birching, Scien-tific Sexualia, etc. State age and pro-fession. ANTHROPOLOGICAL LIBRA-RY, 174 Fifth Avenue, New York. issue is more than 30,000 copies, distributed throughout the United States and foreign countries. With American Spectator Firsts AMERICAN Spectator FIRSts A few coples of the first LIMITED edi-tion of The American Speciator, auto-graphed by the editors, George Jean Nathan, Ernest Boyd, Theodore Dreiser, James Branch Cabell, Eugene O'Neill, and the Publisher, Richard R. Smith, are still available to collectors. Price $25 per copy. this issue, the size of the paper is increased to six pages. Classified advertising 50 cents a line

EXEGESIS

By BURTON RASCOE

many matters, but they were very short-sighted in one thing: they failed to renlize that, although a healthy disagreement of opinion is a salutary way of arriving at the true (or the expedient) in council, it works havoc when this disagreement is expressed in a canon.

When these pious and argumentative fathers of the Christian church established the canon of the New Testament some three hundred and fifty years after the birth of Jesus, the Christ, they included in this canon of their faith-as we know-four distinct biographies of Jesus, the first three differing so much from the Fourth Gospel as to seem to have been written about two quite different men.

This was a much worse thing for them to have done (from a humane, religious or rational point of view) than it would have been for the delegates to the General Convention in Philadelphia in 1787 to have given us Four Federal Constitutions of the United States of America, all bound up together, each reflecting in considerable degree the disharmony of the peculiar casts of mind entertained by members of the assembly.

Confusion and chaos would have been upon us (even before now) if we had four Constitutions, each one held to be inviolate and the first and last letter of the law we were to live by. And schisms and heresies, bloody religious wars and persecutions, inquisitions and inhumanities have followed upon the fact that the bishops and presbyters of the new religion, after the Council of Nicea, could not agree upon an authentic biography (among the many they had) and so gave the Christians four quite different ones as canonical, none of which was to be doubted or disbelieved by the faithful under pain of excommunication or worse, usually worse.

When an ingenuous rational human being is asked to believe two opposed ideas concurrently under pain of damnation or death he is, usually, for a time, quite at a loss to make up his mind. He would like to believe, but he cannot believe two things that cancel each other. He may be ready to believe that "black is white" or "white is black." but such are the simple processes of his mind, he cannot believe that "black is white," "white is black," "white is white" and "black is black" all at the same time. These gymnastics of credulity are beyond him.

If he is of a cunning and deceptive nature, used to keeping counsel with himself against the outrageous furies of an entrenched, coercive and powerful majority, he will give lip service (in order to escape the rack, or in order to exist in peace, or in order to keep intact his immortal common sense and selfrespect) to whatever nonsense is desperately required of him; and he will deepen daily in a cynicism toward the motives, minds and good intentions of all people who insist that other people believe and act exactly as they do.

If, on the other hand, he is at once a credulous and deductive creature, he will figure out that one of the two combative notions he is asked to believe in is the right one. And he will defend his conviction against all the forces combined against him. When this happens it is considered (long after it occurs and when poets and historians with poetical turns of mind begin to deal with the episode) to be a dispensation full of grandeur; but, nevertheless, it is an unpleasant incident, from both the physical and psychical point of view, to the martyr who is undergoing it. I have never been fed to the lions or had my limbs stretched on the rack or had my tongue pulled out by red-hot tongs or been burnt at stake, but I am quite, quite sure that I shouldn't enjoy any of these exhibitions of grandeur.

And I don't believe that any one else, who is not mentally deficient, has. Gavrillo Princep, who plunged us into a world war by his antic at Sarajevo, undoubtedly acted from what, to him, were the highest motives; Czolgosz was proud to die for having murdered the amiable, incompetent and well-thought-of hench-the heart of humanity more than any other; for it is true to what people know of what has been done (usually in a lesser measure) to them and what they have done (usually in a slighter THE Apostolic Fathers were wise and inspired and learned in degree) to others. Existence is a competition and in this compe-many matters, but they were very short-sighted in one thing: tition even the kindest, the best-disposed of persons sometimes otherwise may possess human poise and judgment) and tition even the kindest, the best-disposed of persons sometimes > beds at night they explate in agony some phrase they have used of good sportsmanship; or, worse, as a self-centred creature in conversation which they think may have given offense to one devoid of human feelings; or, worse yet, as crafty and secretive, of their listeners; and this is usually not the phrase that has probably vicious, dishonest, in all likelihood a bully, a wifereally cut. Many wound with deliberation, but most of us don't: beater, and a swindler of widows and orphans. we wound almost incessantly without intending to; we wound by > the mere fact of our existence and by our adherence to those Familiaris is here proposed, it may be well to dismiss from the dimly perceived aims we have in life.

> very old; for we all know that when we seek justice we are unleashed virility at the professor. It may be just as well to ask thwarted everywhere. So many conflicting opinions about justice. those also to leave who through fate or their own inexplicable What may seem justice to you may deprive me of my liberty, choice have the misfortune of being Eskimos, Alp climbers, my income, my sustenance or my life; therefore I cannot always partridge hunters, or itinerant beggars; for these are surely agree with your definition of "Justice". That puts us in disunion; welcome to whatever mitigation they may discover in their combut, in the hearts of both of us, there is, apart from us, away panionship with dogs. Also those baffled ladies who find content-> be attained. It is very unfortunate for you and me and all of us catcher who, reasonably enough, would voice professional protest. that in all our experience or in all our reading we cannot find a single instance where our ideal has been realized. Yet the belief of the dog to companionship with man is a modern degradation, persists and its constant defeat in reality gives glory to the Pas- lagainst which the spirit of our human race, when properly sion of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

> and the Mass, was centuries old, perhaps milleniums old, before as his vilest epithet that of cur, or dog, or descendant of the three of the least authenticated of the Four Gospels say a child maternal side of a dog. Ages of association with the animal was born to Mary, wife of Joseph, in a manger in Bethlehem in have made our language on the subject unmistakable: nothing circumstances which gave rise to a reflection of two extreme can be more abject than to lead a dog's life, nothing more ignoble points of view: the poetic and the nasty.

> the (later interpolated) story of the delivery of Jesus which dogs, or the sort of thing that is thrown to the dogs. An undergossips (and everybody is a gossip) subjected to different inter- dog is, accordingly, a term of unfathomable contempt. Dog-days pretations, according to their temperaments. One form of gossip are wretched days, dog-Latin is wretched Latin; dog-cabbage, held that Mary had been delivered of a child by divine concep- dog-fennel, dog-berry, dog-leek are each the most wretched of tion while still a virgin, though long the wife of Joseph; that their kind. The origin of doggerel does not seem to be certain; she had a special form of intercourse with the Great God but anyone who has read that sort of verse can guess. Jehovah (Yahweh) whereby she conceived and bore a child.

> persons refused to accept. They were quite ready, it seems, to about the implication of "to fawn", "to lick boots", "to yap", accept the story if it had said that Mary was an unmarried "to bark", or "to be kicked around". We speak of "pawing somevirgin. But Mary was married and what one knows about the thing", and of "hounding someone"; and our fables illustrate conduct of the people from whom Joseph and Mary sprung (if spitefulness by "the dog in the manger", and greed by "the dog one has read the frightful Old Testament) is enough to know and the shadow". There is no mention in all the Bible of a single that it is extremely unlikely that a Judean woman should be good trait attributed to a dog. The wise ancients saw the animal married many months and still remain a virgin; for rape, bigamy, without sentimentality or affection: and they wrote of his returnadultery, fornication and sodomy seem to have been the chief ing to his vomit, his fleas, his mange, his unspeakable habits. proclivities of those people. Some seem to have had special vices Their Book is one to swear by.

such as eating shell-fish and pork. One wonders how they found sacred and authentic Word of God.

them a laugh to say that Joseph was a cuckold. It was the it, and something intrusive and meddlesome. It is an attribute of and label the libel with either the name or the initials of our character as humanly can be conceived when he gave Cyrano de Lord Jesus Christ, just as in Paris it is customary to chalk up on the walls of an école libre, "A bas Ramsay MacDonald." These tendencies are immemorial and perpetual with human nature-at once to exalt to godhead a man beloved by a portion of the populace and to make him out both a bastard and a fool. Apotheosizing and denigration are co-eternal in the minds of men. They happened even with the legends of so late a hero as Lincoln. With less tragic heroes, such as Alexander and Caesar and George Washington, whose salvation was through works, not meditation, the tendency is to make them at once too perfect for the incredulous to stomach or to make them monsters of depravity which any reliable physician would explain is contrary to the most robust resources of virility. Many serious and pitiable difficulties resulted from the comparative stupidity of the Apostolic Fathers. They established as sacred, inviolate and the word of God four biographies of His Son so disparate that they have won Ph.D's for Biblical exegitists ever since and have made militant atheists of millions of men, otherwise pious, who like to argue.

CATS AND DOGS

by B. M. STEIGMAN

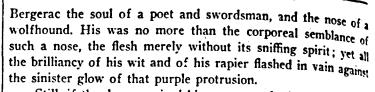

commit cruelties unwittingly and repent of those cruelties if they they become excited and wag irrational enthusiasm. Dare to ever learn of them. Usually they do not learn of them; and intimate that you are not especially fond of the animal, and they usually they repent of cruelties they haven't committed. In their will regard you as an unmanly sort of man, lacking the qualities

As a critique of pure reason anent the quadruped Canis audience those stalwart ones who can be made to see nothing The parable of the just man who is condemned to die is but red, and who might interrupt the proceedings by sicking their from our own particular conflicts of ego, a real ideal justice to ment in holding nothing better on their knees; also the dog-It may then perhaps safely be intimated that the elevation aroused, voices contemptuous protest. In ira veritas. An angry The parable of the Passion, as we know it from the Scriptures eruption will throw up the truth; and an infuriated man hurls than to die like a dog. The level assigned to the creature is By this I mean there were some conditions surrounding apparent when we consider the type of person who goes to the

There is not an attribute of the dog's that is not held up There were elements about this story which narrow-minded for contempt by the language we use. There can be no doubt

Such sagacity as is sometimes attributed to the dog derives time to tend their sheep, so libidinous were they, according to the from his sense of smell. That is of all the senses the least glamourous. Keenness of sight or hearing or taste or touch is The nasty-minded therefore put the reverse interpretation something to boast about. But ability to nose about carries with on the story. You can leave the nasty-minded to do that. It gave it an unenviable implication. There is something skulking about pleasure of the nasty-minded to chalk up on the walls of the the spies and sleuths who ply their ill-bred censorship over the cathedrals, during the Middle Ages, the information that he was four (at their worst) infinitely politer senses we use when we a deceived husband and to draw pictures of an ass with long ears see and hear and taste and touch. Rostand created as tragic a

Still, if the dog exercised his scent merely for its own sake he might be left unmolested to enjoy such distinction as nasal preeminence affords. The trouble is that his exhibition of olfactory virtuosity is invariably only an overture, a preliminary negotiation, which if not altogether polite is at least mentionable in public print. By way of establishing something of a cultural balance, nature has endowed the human companion of a dog with an intermittent eagerness to stop and study the architecture of high buildings, cloud formations, and stars,

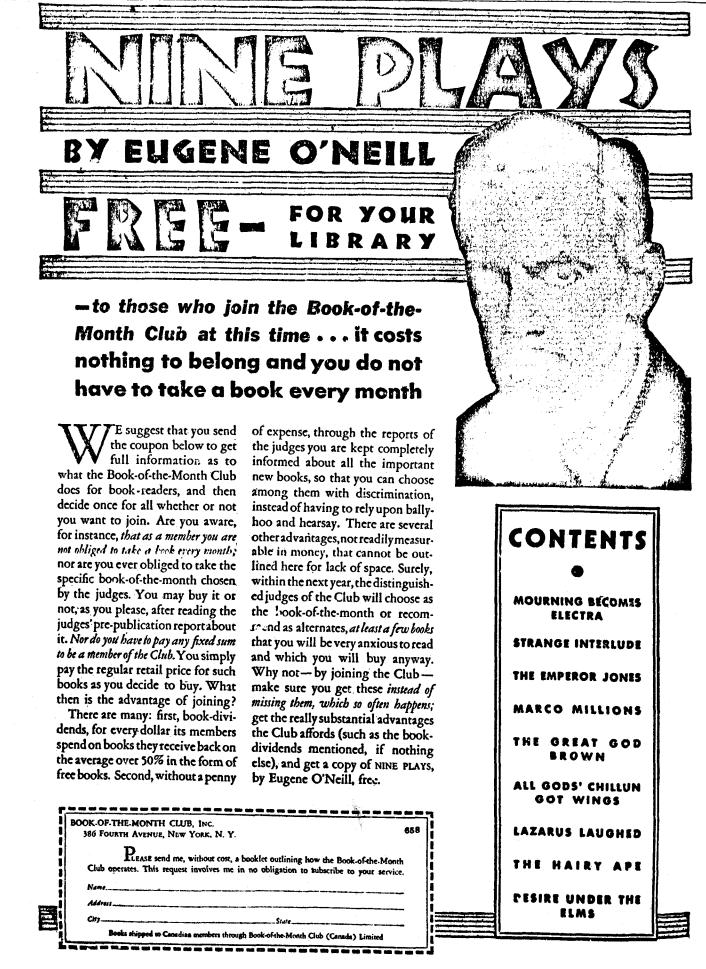

The human companion of a cat has a less secure social and cultural status. For the cat may with impunity he loathed outright. And yet the qualities of the cat are less offensive than those of a dog. Socially, surely one prefers cattish people to those one would consider dogged. The former have the choicest of stories to teli-things one has wanted so much to hear, things that will make fascinating re-telling. Dogged people merely growl; they are obstinate and sullen; they are altogether uninteresting. The best that their most enthusiastic admirers can say for them is that they are faithful. That does not make for incresting social intercourse.

Blood will tell; and certainly there is something aristocratic about the feline family that can boast of members as formidable as the lion, the lynx, and the tiger. The dog's relations, wolves and hvenas, are of the vilest rabble. The cat is exclusive, superior: he walks alone; he is permitted to look at a king. You do not fling a bone to an animal like that: you give him liver. abounding in vitamines, and fish, rich in phosphates. You do not expect him to beg, like a mongrel. Nor do you find him slobbering with gratitude.

He knows his own worth. Not for him the ndifferent sort of mating that has given us unnumbered canine breeds. His courtship has far greater dignity and semblance to romance. There is really something enviable about being put out, when the family retires, to go in quest of adventure and the pleasures c night life; and the next day, when others toil, to lie curled up asleep before the fire. The dog is without imagination. He makes of sex a restless and quite unsightly preoccupation during the day. At night he tumbles in. Should the moon he up he may express himself in raucous barks. Of subtler tributes he knows nothing.

Our difference in attitude toward the two animals is apparent at the very outset of their careers. We regard a puppy as an insolent young upstart, in urgent need of a booting. But we think of something kittenish as playful and charming. The helpless newborn animals should make an equal appeal to our sympathy. But we soon discover that the life of one centres wholly about the impudent sense of smell, that he is virtually an elaborate nose carried about on four legs. The other has extraordinary eyes and ears, savage claws and teeth, impressive whiskers. The cat's whiskers were for some time in colloquial language the ne plus ultra. Truly the animal commands our admiration.

More, he commands something of fear. He was chosen, for good enough reason, presumably, as the companion of witches. He cavorts in unhallowed places, charged with electric and malignant disturbances. His silence and his secretiveness are ominous; so is his preference for darkness.

man of Mark Hanna, and his reasons must have seemed perfectly valid to him: and Giuseppe Zangara was pleased to burst into the limelight and have his pitiable, drab spirit extinguished forever by firing shot at President Roosevelt which killed Mayor Cermak of Chicago.

We do not permit ourselves to believe that these madmen were quite right in their minds. That is to say, they were not right in our minds. But, at this distance, we may concede that the poor devils who gathered in the catacombs and on the campagna of Rome to worship a proscribed religion and were burnt at the stake or thrown to the lions for having done so, are martyrs deserving of our gratitude and of whatever sentimental reveries we can entertain toward them, whenever the incident is brought to our attention by historians or novelists or poets, whose work we happen to be reading while our wives are cooking dinner or when there is no good program on the radio.

One wonders what the gratitude of the present pope of the Holy Roman Catholic Church (baptised Achille Ratti in Desio. Italy, in 1857-he has a vested as well as a fiduciary reason for being grateful to the martyrs), or the gratitude of Wolfgang Lumpenspiegel of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, or the gratitude of James-Jacques Alovsius Smith of Chickasha, Oklahoma, or the gratitude of Burton Rascoe of Larchmont, New York, means then, or now, to a young woman with a beautiful body and an energetic mind who was drawn by some emotional need (or because she had some splendid lover who could not earn a living under the economic inequalities of the reign of that debauched and moronic swine, Commodus, and had taken up this promising Christian faith in a last desperate hope and had converted her to it) into an outlawed sect and had, in explation, when caught and rounded up with other persons denounced by the police as Christians, been tied naked to a stake and burned for the sadistic pleasure of a drunken populace of the precise sort which enjoys a marathon dance or likes to throw pop bottles at an infielder who misses a grounder or at an umpire who gives an instantaneous decision (as, by rule, he must) when the decision is doubtful to other, prejudiced, eyes.

She, that lovely girl whom I see now agonizing in the flames, may have felt exaltation in her extremity. I have seen the coldestblooded murderers on the death march to the scaffold singing hymns of the faith she died for-such is the dispensation of Providence or of a beneficent God or of a kindly jailer with a hypodermic syringe, which makes the condemned at the approach of death, anaesthetic to the quick or slow misery they are about to encounter. But, with memories of a toothache. I don't think that they enjoyed that last agony, whether it be that paralyzing but painful shock of electrocution or this searing of the flesh from faggots lighted beneath one's feet.

I hope that, in the above, my intention is clear. I have tried to give a paradigm of the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ in some of its many varieties and analogies.

This story of the Passion is the one story that has touched

