Continuing his appraisal of the rôle of education in our society, Theodore M. Greene has taken up the problem of the school and what the school must do to approach the major objectives of education (outlined in a previous article). This is the third of a series of articles.

Frederick B. Tolles acquired his knowledge of C.O.'s when he served as educational director at a Civilian Public Service Camp in Big Flats, New York. Since then he has been a member of the administrative staff for the CPS under the American Friends Service Committee and has recently resumed his position at Swarthmore College as instructor in history and librarian of the Friends Historical Library.

The author of the article on the growing importance of Africa in world affairs, Martin Ebon, is a member of the staff of the Foreign Policy Association. He served recently with the Department of State as an information officer and, during the war, he was Chief of the Foreign News Section, Overseas News and Features Bureau, Office of War Information.

Wife of a serviceman overseas, Audrey Adele Georgi left her home in California to spend the duration of the war in Mexico, a country which had always fascinated her. In addition to other writing, in the past year Mrs. Georgi has produced many colorful and informative articles about Mexico; see, for example, the article in this issue.

Edgar Ansel Mowrer launched his syndicated column in the spring of 1943, after almost 30 years of newspaper work. In the first place, he had become a war correspondent largely because he had been able to acquire a passport, a rare object in 1914. High spots of his between-wars career include the first interview with Mussolini as Duce, eviction from Germany by the Nazis in 1933, the Pulitzer Prize (1933), prediction in 1936 of war with Japan, the French Legion of Honor and interviews with most of the statesmen of contemporary Europe. He is the author of six books, among them: Immortal Italy, Germany Puts the Clock Back (the reason for his hasty exit from Germany) and Global War.

The desire to go home is dear to the heart of the service man. Consequently any policy affecting such a move receives his careful scrutiny and is apt to be severely criticized. This month's Forum deals with demobilization. Louis A. Cox upholds the government's policy. Before he was discharged from the Army last September, Cox was a sergeant in the 409th Infantry, 103rd Division, and as a leader of a rifle squad, was wounded in the Siegfried Line. Opposing the present method of demobilization is Elbert P. Thompson, who served until January in the United States Navy. As a second class petty officer, Thompson spent 18 months "all over" the Pacific.
