

THERE'S THY REWARD—

(3 Henry VI, III, 3)

Winsor McCay in the San Francisco Examiner

THEY ALL SAY, BUT—

Thus far it has been all SAYING and no DOING. The soldiers said they would go and they WENT. They said they would fight and they FOUGHT. Some gave their lives, others eyes, arms, legs, health, nerves. All gave courageous service. All risked, and the majority lost their jobs and their places in the procession. There has been enough talking; time to DO something he will be performing his duties quite as effectively as he will when he hales violators of the law to court. And so far as he succeeds in his declared purpose he will fortify all law, which in a self-governing country is but the will of the whole people.

THE NEW SOLICITOR-GENERAL

OF all books published in America about the war few, if any, had greater influence in convincing the people of this country of the justness of the Allies' cause and the criminality of Germany than that entitled "The Evidence in the Case." It presented the evidence against Germany with the skill of an attorney learned in the law and experienced in facing jurors, and with the persuasiveness of one who believes profoundly in the truth of what he advocates. It is a book which stands unrefuted and remains valuable as an expression of what the most intelligent and ultimately most influential Americans believed months before America took her place at the front. The author of this book, James M. Beck, has now been appointed Solicitor-General of the United States. By virtue of his office he will appear as the attorney of the Federal Government before the Supreme Court. He is sixty years old, a Philadelphia by birth, and a graduate of the Moravian College at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. Admitted to the Pennsylvania bar, he became some years later United States attorney for the Eastern District of that State, and in 1900 Assistant Attorney-General of the United States. In recent years he has been practicing law in New York City.

PERSONALITY COUNTS

CORNELL'S choice of Dr. Livingston Farrand for President, like Yale's choice of Dr. Angell, is an indication that personal forcefulness, executive experience, and modern educative ideals are more and more indispensable to educational leadership. Like Yale, Cornell chose a graduate of another college—in this case, Princeton. Dr. Farrand has had teaching experience at Columbia University and the University of Colorado, and has specialized in psychology and in research and exploration in the field of anthropology. At one time he was at the head of the University of Colorado. But his most valuable training in managing men, applying system, and co-ordinating energy has been in non-academic service. Thus in 1917 he took charge in France of the International Health Board's campaign against tuberculosis, and later became Chairman of the Central Committee of the American Red Cross, a position entailing large responsibility and the constant exercise of judgment in dealing with men and things. Cornell is a vast and complex institution. It will find its spirit and energy well directed under its new President.

Equal approval has been given by educators to the choice of Dr. Frank P. Graves as Commissioner of Education for the State of New York by the Regents of the University of the State, which, as most of our readers know, is a governing and not a teaching institution. Dr. Graves was selected from among a large number of men who have been under consideration since Dr. Finley's resignation. He has taught or acted as dean or president in several colleges, has written books and many articles on educational topics, and has lately been editor of the "Educational Review." A noteworthy incident in his career was his resignation of one college presidency (Wyoming University) in order to study for a doctorate in education. He comes to New York from the University of Pennsylvania, where he has been dean of its School of Education. If ever a man was a specialist in the science of education, surely Dr. Graves is.

IN COMMAND OF THE PACIFIC FLEET

Six years ago, when the then Captain Eberle was appointed Superintendent of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, The Outlook remarked: "He is a naval officer of high professional attainment, especially distinguished as an ordnance expert, and, like so many others in the service, possesses a very valid claim to the title of statesman. Naval officers not only must perfect themselves in the technical duties of an exacting profession, but they must possess the ability to embody in their own person the law, the tradition, and the dignity of the country which they represent."

Now Rear-Admiral Eberle has been assigned by the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Pacific Fleet, with the title of Admiral. In view of existing circumstances, Admiral Eberle's assignment is one which will bring out his essential qualities. As when Admiral Sperry was in command of the fleet which went round the world during
