

fairs, but only indirectly. Before a physicist can interest himself in human affairs he must stop being a physicist for the duration of that concern.

The same would be true for an artist. The only proper person to concern himself with the problems of society is the humanist, but he must learn to concern himself with society in a scientific age and not with the past. I suggest it is for philosophers to study the effects of science, not for physicists to be seekers after a philosophy.

The introduction of agriculture and community life altered the role of the artist. In primitive societies artists were free. They expressed their feelings in wild and imaginative ways, which is the appeal of Eskimo art. In civilized societies the artist was tamed and harnessed to the needs of society. Mostly the old masters painted portraits of kings and of the wealthy or landscapes to please them.

Today it is the humanists' turn to be harnessed to a more complex society. Science is placing different demands upon humanists.

C. P. Snow maintains that scientists and humanists don't speak to one another. But the reasons are different. Most scientists, as private individuals, know something of the humanities; the problem is that they don't care about the problems of society. Most humanists on the other hand care very much and, like Barzun, worry about these problems. Their difficulty is that most of them have not yet caught up with the Departments of Scientific Studies directed to training not scientists but scientifically literate humanists.

How is this to be done? There is a danger that people taught a potpourri of science, of history, of economics, of philosophy, and so forth, would be poorly trained in all. I believe the solution is to base such studies on a thorough reading of the history of science starting from the earliest times.

The lectures should be accompanied and illustrated throughout the course by laboratory experiments repeating some of the great scientific discoveries in their historic order. These should be executed with the same rigor as is required in the various science departments, but they should be less numerous so that the student would have time for reading and essay writing. There should be no attempt to complete the scientific training of these students. In the senior years, they should direct their laboratory work to computing and data processing, techniques now recognized to be as useful in the social as in the pure sciences. It should be clearly kept in mind that they are humanists, but humanists with an experience of experimental work.

There is an additional reason for making this effort to produce a man with broad knowledge of the humanities and sciences.

There has been a recent change in the main direction of science. Hotly as many scientists will deny it, science is as much subject to fashion as other human activities. In the last century, geology and evolution, chemistry and engineering held the center of the stage. For a period early in this one, nuclear physics was paramount. Today, studies of planets and of space are important, but even more so are the group of researchers directed to understanding the brain, including information and computer theory, genetics and the DNA code, and biological brain research.

This is a drastic change in the direction of science. Studies of engineering, chemistry, and physics all are concerned with study of matter and energy which are extensions of man's muscles. Brain research and the like are directed to extensions of man's mind. But surely, man's mind is a proper study for humanists. Thus the forefront of scientific research has now entered upon one of the chosen fields of the humanities. I feel it is appropriate to start departments directed toward study of the humanities in the light of modern science.

PERSONALITY PORTRAIT—XCV

HE KEEPS THE BACTERIA JUMPING

Josef Czulak, of Melbourne

WHEN Josef Czulak was discharged from the British Army at the end of World War II, he had no idea what to do with his life. In 1939 he had been a junior subaltern in a crack Polish cavalry regiment. During the war he fought with distinction as an officer of the Polish, French and British armies in turn. In 1946 he had no home, little money and no profession. He did have British citizenship, a Scottish fiancée, and a war veteran's right to a subsidized university education.

He chose to become an agricultural scientist, entered one of Britain's redbrick universities, got married, graduated and stayed on to do graduate work in bacteriology. In 1949, already past 30, he began his scientific career in the central research laboratory of Britain's biggest dairy manufacturing company. Quietly he set to work, and within two years published some significant papers.

In the early 1950s, Australia was desperately short of promising young research scientists. Her graduate schools were producing only a handful of Ph.Ds. Australia's largest government research agency, the Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization (C.S.I.R.O.) was recruiting nearly two-thirds of its research staff from overseas, mainly from Britain. Among the recruits who took ship from Tilbury Dock in 1951 was Josef Czulak.

The job he had accepted offered scope for the most ambitious of young men. Australia's third largest primary industry, dairying, faced serious difficulties. The biggest share of the annual milk production (1.5 billion gallons) went into butter, but the industry also produced 100 million pounds of cheddar cheese per year.

Australian cheese was of indifferent quality, and costs of production were high. In spite of a substantial government subsidy, profits were low. Most of the cheese was produced in small independent factories, owned by private companies or farmer co-operatives. Since most were too small to employ research staff, C.S.I.R.O.'s Division of twentieth century and do not know enough about science to take its impact into proper account.

Some economists in particular will deny this, and I admit that there are distinguished exceptions. But I think the fact that we are governed and that we derive most of our social and business guidance from illiterates in science is a sufficiently serious problem to demand attention from universities.

I certainly don't recommend stopping the study of any branch of learning, nor do I think that old departments can easily be deflected into new directions. I don't think it is any more likely that old philosophers will learn new science than that scientists will willingly study philosophy.

To meet a new requirement, I suggest, requires that universities form new Dairy Research was enlarged to cope with the research problems of the entire industry. Czulak became leader of a small team of work on cheesemaking.

The manufacture of cheddar cheese is a simple process. A large vat of lukewarm milk, perhaps 2000 gallons, is inoculated with acid-producing bacteria which cause the milk to sour rapidly. When it is sour enough, rennet is added to cause the milk to coagulate. The coagulum is cut into small cubes which separate from the whey. The mixture of curds and whey are heated slightly and stirred, while the curd particles shrink and still more acid is produced. Then the whey is drained off, leaving the curd on the bottom of the vat.

The curd is cut into blocks and the blocks turned over at frequent intervals. During this "cheddaring process," the granules of curd fuse together to form a homogenous mass. Finally, the curd is cut into strips about the size of a finger, salted, and pressed into blocks which, after maturing, become cheese. The whole process, up to the pressing stage, takes five and a half to six hours.

Czulak tackled the easy problems first. He soon learned that the "starter" bacteria, essential to the whole process, were often not doing their job. This was because they were becoming infected with bacteriophage, a virus which quickly destroys them.

When a cheese factory is infected with bacteriophage, there is only one cure—to change to another strain of bacteria, immune to the virus. But no one knew whether the virus which attacked bacterium A would also attack bacterium B.

Czulak collected samples of all the bacterial cultures in use, and imported others from abroad. By determining their bacteriophage relationships, he was able to tell cheesemakers which culture to switch to whenever a "starter" failed.

Still the industry's problem wasn't solved. It was one thing to know which strain to switch to, but where were pure, typed cultures obtainable?

No manufacturer seemed interested in preparing them.

Czulak and his chief, G. Loftus Hills, persuaded the Australian Dairy Produce Board (the industry's export marketing authority) to provide funds, and the Division began to prepare pure, freeze-dried phials of typed "starter" cultures. For over a decade, thousands of these phials have been distributed to the industry every year.

During the course of his studies of cheese-making bacteria, Czulak was struck by the fact that the cheesemaking process, in moving from farm to factory in the nineteenth century, had been merely scaled up. It remained completely unmechanized. Every operation was carried out by hand. Cheesemaking had a high content of labor, and hard labor at that. In the hot Australian summer many a bead of honest sweat fell into the cheese vats.

In the laboratory, Czulak began to experiment. Could the early stages, in which the curd particles shrink, be accelerated? Yes they could, by using higher temperatures and heat tolerant bacteria. Up to one and a half hours could be cut from the process time. Could the "cheddaring" process be cut from half an hour or more to a few minutes? Perhaps, but how? Dozens of machines were built, to press curd hard, to squeeze it gently. They all failed to produce homogeneous, smooth-textured curd. There was argument, chain-smoking, despair. Finally, the solution was hit upon: not pressure (which fused the granules together) but deformation that accompanied flow, during the squeezing of a block of curd to half its thickness and twice its width.

Ingenuity and hard work took over from there. In 1957 a group of Australian cheese industry representatives were invited to the C.S.I.R.O. laboratory at Highett, Victoria, to witness a demonstration. They saw, for the first time since cheese was first made 4000 years ago, a batch of cheese produced entirely by machine, without the milk or curd being touched by human hand.

To be sure, the "cheddaring" machine was cumbersome and unsuitable for scaling up to factory size. But the rest of the plant, which handled all the other operations, was not. A machinery manufacturer was given a license under Czulak's patent, and the first commercial model was installed by the Kraft organization at their Allansford, Victoria, plant, largest cheese factory in Australia. Other orders quickly followed. Cheese-making machines have since been exported to the United States and Great Britain.

Last year was a busy year for Josef Czulak. Now an authority on cheesemaking, he was asked by the Indian Government to show the Indian industry how to make good cheese from buffalo milk. He was in Japan, in connection with a new cheese-drying process. He was in the United States when the first of his machines was commissioned.

The quality of Australian cheese has increased markedly in the last decade. The industry owes much to Josef Czulak; indeed, his ideas are spreading across the world. Yet it is not only his scientific work that has been valuable. Had he been content to publish his work in learned journals, its impact might well have been negligible.

ALWAYS the cavalryman (with a horse at hand on the farm he occupies with his psychiatrist wife and stepdaughter, twenty-five miles outside Melbourne) he charges over the countryside in one direction or another continuously with unbridled Slavic ebullience, his clear blue eyes looking very directly at whatever and whomever crosses his path. In fighting the foes of his adopted neighborhood, he once took on a railroad that threatened to invade some property. At another time he argued himself out of a local police court sentence for speeding on the highway. During those inevitable intervals when events slow down, he runs his hands through his salt and pepper hair with intense Slav despair. But his nerves remain steady throughout, as he will demonstrate with fiendish finesse at the bridge table. For relaxation, he builds rock walls and fences on the farm, thereby keeping himself in automatic physical trim without wearing himself down to the wiry cliché of the amateur athlete.

His ideas have caught on because he has made them catch on. He has travelled Australia from end to end, arguing, haranguing, and demonstrating. Old-established conservative industries are not easily persuaded to change their ways. But when scientific originality is combined with determination, boundless energy and drive, the most deeply entrenched traditions can be upset.

Parallel Proverbs

foolishness that is not sponsored by some sage." Our "A word to the wise is sufficient" is elaborated by the Czechs: "To a wise man, just whisper; but to a fool you must spell out everything."

Gossips also come in for their share. "He who knows little soon repeats it," say the Spaniards, and the Turks add: "Who gossips to you will gossip about you."

Some proverbs make you feel like arguing the point. Hungary's "Good wine needs no publicity" is quite at variance with America's "It pays to advertise." One could also dispute Albania's "Better to suffer misfortune quickly than to wait too long for good fortune," or Arabia's "All that is hidden is sought after."

"Don't get 'American stomach' by eating too fast" is the gist of several proverbs in many languages, like Italy's "At table you don't grow older," or China's "Work may be hastened, but not food."

In addition to proverbs, there are picturesque similes. "For eating, like a wolf; for working, like a log" is Rumania's way of describing some people. "Lucky like a dog in church" is Italy's description of bad luck. "As nice as soot is white" is Russia's expression of disgust, while the Arabic reply to a sympathetic inquiry as to how things are going is "Like tar!" and the Chinese puts it: "Seven kinds of mess, eight kinds of disorder." If you want to be in a desirable spot against the wishes of those in control, you are said by the Italians to be trying to "get into Paradise in spite of the Saints." Other people are said to be "looking for work and praying to God they won't find it."

It is fashionable in some quarters to describe certain groups as backward, ignorant, illiterate. There may be mechanical justification for these epithets, but you certainly cannot prove mental inferiority or lack of philosophical perception by the language or proverbs of many of these groups. Take, as a single example, the Swahili of East Africa. "To speak is good, and not to speak is good" parallels the European "Speech is silver, silence is gold." "He who is there above, await him below" sounds very much like our "Pride goes before a fall." "He who is not here, and his business is not here" reminds you of the Italian "The absent are always in the wrong." There is a world of earthly wisdom in "Whether the cock crows or not, it will dawn"; "Drunkenness takes away sense"; "Whether you have little or much, be content." And what has the West to offer that surpasses this triad in philosophical content: "Profit surpasses pride"; "Understanding surpasses property"; "As for dying, we shall all die?"

DIRECTIONS

To solve this puzzle you must guess twenty-odd WORDS, the definitions of which are given in the column headed DEFINITIONS. Alongside each definition, there is a row of dashes—one for each letter in the required word. When you have guessed a word, write it on the dashes, and also write each letter in the correspondingly numbered square of the puzzle diagram. . . . When the squares are all filled in, you will find that you have completed a quotation from some published work. If read up and down, the letters in the diagram have no meaning. . . . Black squares indicate ends of words; if there is no black square at the right side of the diagram, the word carries over to the next line. . . . When all the WORDS are filled in, their initial letters spell the name of the author and the title of the piece from which the quotation has been taken. Of great help to the solver are this acrostic feature and the relative shapes of words in the diagram as they develop. Authority for spellings and definitions is Webster's New International Dictionary, Second and Third Editions.
